In 1999, the United Nations faced a pivotal moment as it prepared for the new millennium. While there wasn't a single "convocation" by that name, the 1999 Commission on Sustainable Development (CSD-7) served as the critical global gathering focused on the burgeoning crisis of sanitation and the protection of the world's oceans {ref 1}.

During this period, the UN identified that over 2.4 billion people lacked basic sanitation, a "global natural problem" that bridged the gap between public health and environmental integrity. The discussions centered on the fact that human waste was not just a medical issue, but a primary pollutant of the global commons—the oceans. The 1999 sessions emphasized that "cleanliness" was a prerequisite for sustainable development, leading to the "Global {ref 2} Programme of Action for the Protection
